A: Instead of using the RTCDriver.h and RTCDriver.cpp files included in the Microsoft windows DDK they are now built in to the WDK, so you just need the following files: wddk\rtc\minimal.c wddk\rtc\wddmgr.h wddk\rtc\wddmgr.cpp wddk\rtc\wddmgr.lst wddk\rtc\wddmgr.rc wddk\rtc\wddmgr_stubs.c wddk\rtc\wddmgr_stubs.h The files are from WDK 8.1, but they should work fine with WDK 10 as well. Q: How to create an "asynchronous" or "non blocking" socket in Python? I'm using the socket module in Python to create a socket. The socket then connects to another socket, and communicates with it. To make the communication work, I have to "wait" (like a callback). The current approach is like this: def function_1(self, data): data = function_2(data) data = function_3(data) data = function_4(data) self.sock.sendall(data) def function_2(self, data): # processing data return data def function_3(self, data): def function_4(self, data): I want to move the processing of the data in the different functions to another thread (or process). The questions are: what would be the best approach? how would I make this "non blocking"? I read this: but I don't really understand it. Thanks for your time. To move the processing of the data in the different functions to another thread (or process). You can use multiprocessing. Pool to create new worker processes and move the work from
