Deficit financing Deficit financing (also called debt finance or capital finance) is the use of cash flows generated by operating activities of a company to cover the cost of investment projects. The deficit of an entity with respect to an activity (or project) may be a measure of the difference between the cash flows (i.e., revenue minus expenses) generated by the activity and the cash required to complete the activity. Suppose a corporation is running low on cash and is looking to increase its cash flow. To this end it can make an investment that generates higher income, or invest into its current operations, in a way that generates higher cash flow. In the first scenario it can issue more debt and borrow the money for the investment. In the second scenario, it could carry on with the current operations but generate more revenue to cover the cost of the investment.

Problems with use of cash flows In a situation where a company is running out of cash, it may find itself in trouble. The company can make a profit in the current year, yet still find itself with a negative cash flow. However, it may still be able to service the debt from the previous year, by issuing new debt or extending the maturity of the debt. Capital vs debt Companies that use deficit financing are sometimes said to have made use of capital finance. Deficit financing differs from debt financing in that there is a financing and a real activity being funded. In a deficit, the funds do not return to the company as debt holders would. References
