"....unless, perhaps, you can dream up a way that lets me kill the bastard from a distance, using a head-mounted display and a holstered handgun." They have overplayed their hand, IMO. If they don't get us into a market where they can actually make money, then they won't have any reason to exist. Nintendo (and to a lesser extent Sega) have both moved into the mobile and social space, to a degree, with Miitomo and the upcoming Super Mario Run. But Nintendo has a long history of not being "web connected," preferring the purity of games. That's good, but it doesn't necessarily mean they will stick to it. If they have some bright idea along the lines of, say, the DS streaming mobile games to the console, I'll back them with both money and prayers. As for the Nintendo Switch, it is a hybrid device that can function as either a game console or a handheld. They won't have any problems in the marketplace, but if it turns out that it's primarily used as a game console, then they'll have no reason to exist. And that's where they'll wind up being stuck, in my view. As to the Wii U... My own view is that they really screwed up the design and development of the Wii U. The interface was unnecessarily complicated, requiring the use of a stylus, for example. And you had to have "legacy" games or you couldn't access the eShop. The loss of third-party support (and the loss of the casual market in general) were the two biggest factors in the failure of the console, in my view. I'm not sure they'll be able to escape this any time soon, if ever. The fact that they've turned it into an internet-only console with no back-catalog or online capabilities is a death knell for a company like Nintendo. If they can't easily sell games on the eShop, if there's no accessible way for people to acquire games, then there's no real reason for the general public to want them. ....unless, perhaps, you can dream up a way that lets me kill the bastard from a distance, using f3e1b3768c
