I would like to set up a script that will automatically re-run on every startup (even if the machine has been shut down or the kernel updated), unless the script fails to run. Requirements: On each startup the script should re-run. If the machine has been shut down or the kernel updated the script is allowed to fail, but should still re-run. The script can run as long as my session is still alive (except if it is closed). How do I go about doing this? Edit: I want to start a test, and that test should take a week to finish. I want to be able to easily check whether it has run without having to login to the computer or watch the log all the time. If it does not run, then when the session is closed or the kernel updated, it should not have a hard error, and should re-run on the next reboot. A: You could try adding your script in /etc/init.d/ and running update-rc.d defaults It should run it when the system is next rebooted. If the machine has been shut down or the kernel updated the script is allowed to fail, but should still re-run. The script can run as long as my session is still alive (except if it is closed). you could create a cron job crontab -e to run the script every day at 12:00am or if you want to run every time the Kernel is updated crontab -e and add @reboot if the machine has been shut down or the kernel updated the script is allowed to fail, but should still re-run.
