The turbocharger uses the power of exhaust gases from the engine in a turbine housing to spin a wheel (turbo impeller) that is connected to a shaft which drives a compressor wheel that compresses air (oxidant) into the engine intake manifold. Typically, the turbine housing and the compressor wheel are connected to each other by a so-called “disconnect” coupling. A turbocharger can serve two purposes: (1) boost pressure for engine starting, and (2) efficiency improvement for high engine speeds. In engine operation, a turbocharger increases the pressure ratio, and thereby the torque, through the use of exhaust gases.
