The seasonal dynamics of stable phosphorus isotope in coastal shallow water of Pearl River Estuary was studied in this paper, and the influences of different environmental factors on the stable phosphorus isotope of the coastal water were analyzed. The results showed that delta18O values of all the surface water samples were not significantly different from the isotope signature of the local meteoric water. The seasonal dynamics of the stable phosphorus isotope was regular, but the delta18O values of the samples collected in summer were less than those collected in other seasons. The delta18O values of the coastal shallow water had the same trend as the salinity, and the salinity showed a significant negative correlation with the delta18O values of the shallow water samples. The results of the principal component analysis showed that the variation of the delta18O values of the coastal shallow water samples were affected by the seasonal and the geographical factors. The correlation coefficients of the delta18O values of the coastal shallow water with environmental factors showed that salinity was the most important factor, and the other factors were not significant. The delta18O values of the samples were significantly negatively correlated with salinity and phosphate concentration, and the spatial distribution of the delta18O values showed a significant correlation with salinity.Laminaria mucilago
