

BOEING 777 WIND TURBINE FUEL PIPING 1-20-2013, 11:43 AM I had one of these in my garage for years. I finally found the manual for it. Would this info be useful to anyone else? The B777 has 2 manifolds. They are in a different location than the 767's and no 767 has the jets on the inside. There are 6 main burners and 6 auxiliary burners in the engine. There are three of each on each side of the plane, which are shifted left and right. You can also move them up and down in position, and change the distribution of the burners between the two manifolds. This is controlled from the flight deck console (circuitry board is here - ). As I recall, the auxiliary burners use about 1/3rd the amount of fuel as the main burners and give the airplane a nice wide angle thrust profile (like you'll want on approach and landing). Thanks for the info. Now I know where to go when I'm ready to get that B777 back in the air. Do you know how to adjust them from a computer? My B77s are too big for my console. The big buttons are a mess. 01-15-2013, 09:17 PM This video of a B777 takeoff is a very good demonstration of the jet exhaust noise. What bothers me is the windmill starting up. You hear the exhaust with the airplane running. You should also be able to hear it on the takeoff roll, but there's a lot of wind noise that drowns it out. I'm sure that when it comes to windmill start ups they have to know it's going to happen and perhaps move away from the windmill until it's ready to go. That may be a pain for the windmill operator, but I can deal with that. But what bothers me about a windmill starting up is that you're going to be hearing the jet exhaust with the airplane running on the runway.
