The stretch of road would be up to a 65 kilometre long dual carriageway with a total cost of approximately NZ$1 billion. At its most ambitious, the project was to be named the 'Princes Highway' in honour of the people of New Zealand. It would include a new town, East Nelson, which would be the city's first suburb north of Motueka. The motorway was deemed necessary by the Government of the time as part of the development of the Nelson Lakes area. The extension of the Princes Motorway would have connected to the existing road network to the west and in particular to the East Coast Highway which was to become the New Zealand State Highway 1. In February 2006 the project was shelved after Cabinet decided to construct a bypass of the University of Nelson instead. History 1870-1907 The New Zealand Provincial Highway (NZPHD) was a road from Port Chalmers to Gisborne, across the northern section of the South Island. Construction was initially delayed because a railway to be built across the peninsula was never constructed. It was eventually built in 1872, with the first section opened between St Mary's and Motueka in December 1873. The main route through the eastern section of the South Island was via the Old Dunedin to Glenorchy road. 1907-1945 In 1907 construction of the Dunedin to Nelson highway was begun and completed in 1923. This road was the first portion of a proposed road connecting all of the centres of the major towns in the South Island. 1945-1950 In 1947, with the
