A: With a little searching, I found that there is a script on GitHub that will extract the necessary data from the zip file. In the GitHub repository there is a list of script that will read the zip and convert it to another format, either plain text or an online database. I've downloaded the zip and tried it with one of the scripts but not yet managed to run it. I'll update this answer when it's done. Got a news tip? Is there something you think we should be reporting on? Email news@usgamer.net. Super Mario Maker 2 will allow you to create your own custom levels. That's no longer the only new feature, but the ability to make your own levels was one of the biggest announcements from Nintendo during the Switch's launch event in January. Today, we get our first hands-on with the game, and it looks awesome. I was able to create a couple of Mario levels in the morning, and they were both pretty fun, so it's good to know that the game will be able to support a lot of content. The problem with Mario Maker, though, is that it's not a very good game, so it's up to you to put together a good level. Making your own levels doesn't work exactly the same way as before. Now, you can only select one of the characters and one of the Koopalings, which is actually a great change. The character you select determines what the level will look like, and the Koopalings are either blue or yellow. The Koopalings can't jump or run, but they can attack with fireballs. You can also make the level more difficult by giving it a certain amount of coins. You'll find that this is much more valuable than the coins that you pick up on your own, so I expect most people will find levels with a lot of coins to be too easy, even if they're not intended to be. The difference in how levels are built is interesting, but in terms of game design, it feels the same. You can move blocks and barrels around, and if you fall off the stage, you'll die. There's no energy system this time, but Mario can still jump to higher areas to avoid getting hit by enemy fi
