Toward a comprehensive approach to disseminating diabetes research findings for real-world practice. To identify how diabetes researchers and clinicians collaborate to disseminate research findings, and factors that influence this collaboration. We conducted in-depth interviews with 30 key informants (including 12 research and two clinic/education investigators, two academic researchers, two medical journal editors, and six clinical care researchers). We identified four influential factors in the dissemination process: 1) the requirements for extramural funding; 2) academic position; 3) the scientific issues; and 4) individual circumstances. Based on these findings, we describe a model for disseminating diabetes research findings that can be used by research teams to make their research ready for the next steps of the dissemination process.

The explosives, including what turned out to be a fake bomb, were found last week in a shed behind the synagogue and the restaurant, authorities said. The five suspects were arrested in New Jersey and New York. The plot allegedly revolved around avenging the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, federal prosecutors said. The defendants tried to detonate plastic explosives at the mosque in the borough of Queens. The indictment also said that one of the men allegedly entered the bombing attempt at the restaurant from a fire escape, wearing a hat with swastikas on it. The men, who were identified as Sedrick Rosales, 35, of Brooklyn; Gregory McElroy, 38, of New Jersey; Cody R. Brown, 20, of New Jersey; and J.J. Bowers, 33, of New York, are facing charges of attempting to maliciously damage and destroy a religious place and attempting to use weapons of mass destruction. After the arrests, the Justice Department said in a statement that the men had planned to carry out a series of attacks against ethnic and religious groups, including the restaurant where they lived. Rosales had past convictions for crimes including attempted murder, prosecutors said. He
