Thyroid hyperplasia is a heterogeneous condition characterized by an increase in thyroid cell size and number. Although uncommon in the general population, it is relatively common in individuals with chronic thyroid disorders and patients with other endocrine diseases, particularly when they are over-weight. Thyroid hyperplasia should be distinguished from thyroid cancer. The main goals of treatment are to alleviate symptoms (mainly dyspnoea and dysphagia) and to maintain serum TSH levels within the physiological range. For symptomatic patients, medical treatment of hyperthyroidism is usually effective, whereas surgery is necessary in patients with malignant thyroid disease. Radioactive iodine may be used in the thyroid remnant ablation.So-called "click chemistry" is a versatile approach for the synthesis of a range of organic functional materials.
