From the CoreOS's documentation: Instances are small units of hardware provisioned for running a set of processes. and Nodes are smaller units of hardware that run one or more instances. Can someone clarify what is the difference between the instances and the nodes in CoreOS? I'm a bit confused by the two documents since I thought that instances are smaller versions of the nodes? A: See: An instances (referred to as nodes in earlier releases) is an immutable unit of compute resource, such as an EC2 instance or Compute Node. Instances can be launched in one or more regions across availability zones and are typically used to run one or more applications on a CoreOS installation. Also see: An instance of the OS will typically run a single service with a single process manager. In contrast, a CoreOS installation includes multiple instances of the OS, each running multiple applications and processes in a "microservice" design. Each of these instances can be thought of as a node in a larger cluster. Where can we find more informations? See If you're already using Kubernetes, use it. CoreOS's best practices mean your Kubernetes configuration shouldn't change much from the default.
