Yet, when you start paying attention to the Wu-Tang Clan's special new king, Yung Lean, you'll find the artist is not only willing to tell you his age, he's even open to revealing just how young he really is. In the wake of Thursday's publication of Forbes' 30 Under 30 list, Lean scored $826,000 in music royalties and $300,000 in clothing sales for his new collaboration with Puma. While the Wu-Tang Clan is fresh on the Forbes rich list, it's actually Lean who is the newer entrant to the prestigious list. The magazine named Lean the world's youngest hip-hop artist for his work as the chief of a musical collective called Skulls Make The Best Mistakes. That group has not been around for very long, but its members have already racked up some notable moments in hip-hop history. Earlier this year, a 19-year-old Lean was the only rapper (and Wu-Tang member) to show up for the DePaul University commencement ceremony with a rapper for a law. Besides an affiliation with the Wu-Tang Clan, the collective's major accomplishments have been creating one of hip-hop's most distinctive looks. Lean has embraced the streetwear aesthetic that is so omnipresent in today's hip-hop, and he's been wearing those signature blacked-out glasses ever since he first appeared in 2008 on the video for the single "Issues 2d92ce491b
