On the floor: The Republican National Committee is making a play for African-Americans in 2018, playing on Trump's affinity with the black church and his history as a businessman. | Michael S. Williamson/AP Photo 2020 Elections RNC turns back to Trump to rescue seats in purple states The party is hoping to flip the House by painting Democrats as out of touch and out of step with black voters. The Republican National Committee is shifting its focus from voter suppression to suburban moderates in the fight to save Republican seats in swing districts, hoping the 2018 playbook — painting vulnerable Democrats as out of touch with black voters — can work in a dozen races that will determine control of the House. The Republican National Committee is making a play for African-Americans in 2018, playing on President Donald Trump's affinity with the black church and his history as a businessman. And the RNC is banking on white suburban voters to reject Democratic policies like Medicare for All and opposition to health-care reform. "Democrats are far more in favor of eliminating private health insurance, and their proposals would mean major cuts to Medicare for seniors," said RNC spokeswoman Mandi Merritt. "We have seen suburban and rural voters embrace the president and his policies, and that will be a theme we will use to drive turnout." Democrats dismissed the RNC's efforts, saying suburban voters are the ones who have fled to Republicans in recent years and trying to win over their white, college-educated voters will be tough. "The Republican Party is just plain desperate because they are defending so many seats in purple states," said Democratic strategist Zac Petkanas. "The biggest problem for them 2d92ce491b
