The effects of hyperthermia, radiation, and hyperthermia plus radiation on the isozymes of lactate dehydrogenase in normal, regenerating, and malignant murine fibroblasts. We have observed a decrease in activity of lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) isozymes in normal, regenerating, and malignant murine fibroblasts at temperatures (from 37 to 42 degrees C) that are lethal to tumor cells. Lactate dehydrogenase isozymes were separated on cellulose acetate electrophoresis and quantitated spectrophotometrically. In addition to its already-known influence on LDH isozymes, hyperthermia affects other cellular functions. We have observed: an increase in the levels of the LDH-5 isozymic form in normal, regenerating, and malignant fibroblasts, an increase in the ratio of LDH-5 to LDH-4 in normal fibroblasts at hyperthermic temperatures, a decrease in the activity of LDH-3 in normal fibroblasts, and a decrease in the activity of LDH-5 and LDH-4 in malignant fibroblasts. A decrease in the activity of LDH-3 in normal fibroblasts at hyperthermic temperatures was also observed. // Protocol Buffers for Go with Gadgets
