Q: AngularJS: Displaying a child element after a child element has been rendered I have a number of ng-repeat directives that are supposed to render a graphical chart. These directives insert the actual chart inside an element with an ng-switch directive. Here's an example: The problem is that when the ng-switch element is rendered, it doesn't yet know which module is going to be selected, so until all charts are rendered, the user will not be able to view any of the charts (since the ng-switch element won't yet be rendered). I tried watching for the $scope.$apply() change in the controller (to force the controller to refresh), but it seems like Angular doesn't call that change event until after all the directives are rendered. So, is there a way to call the $scope.$apply() when the ng-switch element is rendered? I'm trying to avoid adding a binding to the ng-switch element from the controller, since that would mean that both the controller and the directive would bind to the same variable. A: You could use ng-switch-when as an expression and watch the state of the plans variable in the controller. //JS $scope.$watch('plans',function(newPlans) { if (newPlans) { $scope.$apply(); } else { $scope.plans = false;
