What is a Container. What is a Container. What are containers? Containers provide a way to group related data into a single unit, called a container, to reduce the overall physical footprint on storage and the amount of data moving around within a network. Each container is an independent entity that can be run and deleted separately from other containers in the system. Containers simplify provisioning for operating systems and applications that require multiple independent machines, such as a global web or email application, by ensuring that these applications run in a contained environment. A container does not, however, actually change the way a workload or application is deployed. You still use the same techniques for deploying, managing, and monitoring containers as you do for bare operating systems or their subcomponents.
