has shown that the planet has warmed by 0.8 degrees in the last decade. Of course, all is not what it seems. Of the many important findings from the IPCC report, two deserve special mention. The first is that not only has the surface of the oceans risen but that it is happening much faster than had previously been thought. On average, this is equivalent to about 18 inches of sea level rise a century. This has implications for coastal communities and makes the importance of coastal protection a national priority. In its wake, the IPCC report has put forward the hypothesis that the steady increase in the frequency and intensity of extreme weather events is

Office XP SP3 English contains all the stability and security updates released for Office XP SP3.
