Advanced PassGen Portable was reviewed by Saravanan Chidambaram, last updated on March 12th, 2014 Do people have the right to release a secret recording of a conversation that someone did not know was being recorded? Well, at least one Minnesota couple thinks so, and the answer, in their case, seems to be: yes. They made a secretly recorded conversation between themselves and their son's hockey coach. Their son was getting unwanted attention, they said, from a female coach, and they were fearful of retaliation. So they secretly recorded one of the coach's phone calls. "We felt that he was saying inappropriate things," said Deborah Blum, who made the recording and who said she was a parent and taxpayer. "We were worried about him making those statements to our children." So, in an apparent first in Minnesota, a couple secretly recorded a conversation between themselves and a teacher, and they did it without the teacher's knowledge. The couple, Blum and her husband, Jim Blum, are members of the Minnesotans for Honest Government, a group that supports public access to the government's records. They want the recordings released and are asking the courts to order the release. The coach, Tony McPhee, denied the couple's allegations and then sought to get the recording taken away from them. He claimed it was private property, that it had been illegally recorded and that they could be liable for invasion of privacy if the recording was released. In other words, he thought he had the right to keep the recording from the public, which
