Database developers can implement their own database access layers (DDL), using the system functions DDL objects, and interface with the user tables or other databases or databases in the same Oracle Database. DDL is a set of basic objects used by developers and system administrators to manage the database, by providing access to data, jobs, users, schemas and other tasks. At the beginning, DDL was accessible only to developers, but then was made more accessible to people who did not have an in-depth knowledge of database programming.
