R. K. Date (11/27/2002) Manfred Bekkering (11/27/2002) Krishna Venkatraman (12/19/2002) By the time of the world war II, Wehrmacht field commanders were issued with maps for military operations . In addition, Wehrmacht leaders included political and other charts in their offices. German military maps were divided into two types . The first type of map that a German commander received or saw on the battlefield was a sector map or a divisional map that was produced to allow commanders to keep track of their troops on the battlefield by seeing what sectors or divisions had been assaulted and pushed back as the day progressed . copied by: 2014 The second type of map was a sector map that depicted one sector at a time. Usually, a sector map showed the terrain of a sector on a small-scale map or section of a larger map with the details of the terrain in the foreground. The sector map made it possible for German commanders to see the progress of their troops in a given sector on a smaller-scale map. copied by: 2015 The German military also drew a third type of map from time to time. This type of map consisted of four parts. It had a large map of the terrain covering a long strip of land along a sector in question. On this large map, one was given an indication of the overall composition of the enemy's forces, including where he had his trenches, where his troops were located, etc. A lesser scale map, or a sector map, was plotted next to the large map. This sector map showed details of the terrain, the movement of the German troops, etc. Finally, a small-scale map 3da54e8ca3
