Organic light emitting devices (OLED) are light emitting display devices using a thin film organic material, have excellent characteristics such as self-emission, high luminance, and a light weight, and are therefore attracting much attention as a next generation of flat display device for mobile applications. A basic structure of such an organic light emitting device is a two-layer type structure of a positive electrode and a negative electrode between which an emitting layer is interposed. A low molecular organic material or a polymer organic material is generally used for an emitting layer, and the organic light emitting device is driven by a voltage applied between the positive electrode and the negative electrode. In the organic light emitting device, a required luminance of the organic light emitting device, and a method of driving the same can be controlled by adjusting a light emission area. However, to improve the power efficiency or luminance of the organic light emitting device, it is necessary to use a technique for improving the efficiency of extracting the light from a light emitting layer to a top surface. For this purpose, there has been employed a technique of patterning a color filter (CF) so as to have a light extraction shape corresponding to a light emitting region of the organic light emitting device, thereby improving the light extraction efficiency. JP-A-Hei 5-209874 discloses a technique of forming a barrier rib (in order to avoid short-circuit between an adjacent thin film transistor and pixel electrodes) corresponding to a light extraction region. By doing so, the light can be efficiently extracted to the outside of the pixel. As a mask used for forming a barrier rib, JP-A-2006-128921 discloses a technique of forming an opening by using a 821383394e
