Matching learning for names and places: individual differences in implicit and explicit learning of place-name pairs. This study investigated whether there are individual differences in explicit and implicit memory for place names. Previous studies found that explicit memory for names and places is influenced by how often people use a certain type of spatial location (high frequency versus low frequency). More frequent spatial representations in long-term memory were associated with better memory for names and places (high- versus low-frequency items). Here, we investigated whether this type of spatial representation might lead to better explicit or implicit memory for place-name pairs. On one day, college students from a university did a memory task. On another day, they were exposed to a picture of a familiar place without the name of the place. The location of the place was recorded, and then, on the next day, subjects were tested for recall of the location of the place. In 4 different experiments, we found consistent results showing that participants were better at recalling the name of the place when place-name pairs were low-frequency and when participants had had a low frequency of using the place in the first place. To conclude, participants were better at remembering the name of a place when they had not used the place in the past. In the explicit memory task, learning the place-name pairs was facilitated by the presence of a high frequency of using the place for the learning context.
