A: Today I got this question again from a person who has a project with .NET based on our software and is not happy with the expiration of the software license. He was looking for a .NET tool to check the validity of the license. I was surprised by this question because I have not seen a Microsoft tool for that. But here is an overview of the options you have: The Windows licenses framework is not well documented, and it can differ depending on which version of Windows you are using. But you can check online for the information you need. A company that is interested in the Microsoft licensing framework is Microsoft Licensing. A: I'm not sure where you got the idea that the PM License only lasts for 2 years, as that's not the case. The Microsoft Windows Software End-of-Sale Certificate (EOSC) that you see on the Microsoft website when you buy a Microsoft Windows license. You can download this certificate, its in.txt and.xml format, and sign the XML file with a licensed copy of Microsoft Windows. This will provide the validity of the Microsoft Windows License. This can be used with your application if its only for Windows, or on other operating systems if you develop software that runs on multiple operating systems. The newer way to validate a Microsoft Windows License is to use the Windows Application Store Product Authenticity Tool (a web application) where you verify your Windows License license. This will also validate the validity of your Microsoft Windows License. This too can be used with any application, not just Windows. A: Actually there is an application for Windows which will not only validate the Windows license but will also check for Windows 10 upgrades or even for Windows 8.1 upgrades. The name 570a42141b
