Thursday, November 20, 2006 The Staff & Management of Small Business Development Centers (SBDCs) have a core responsibility to assist community-based business owners with the difficult task of making the complex transition from selling products or services to a concept-based business. We believe that the products and services that we sell to our clients are not the true attributes of small business, but are merely embellishments upon the true heart and soul of running a successful business, which is the ability to create, develop, and sell ideas. Many small businesses are created because a person has a great idea and the resources to make it work. The web of concepts that drive this idea are often developed over years and can be numerous. Such an idea, if it is going to be successful, needs to be developed in the service of a need in the marketplace. Rather than just sitting around in the head of the owner, the idea is typically developed with input from others. These people, often referred to as co-inventors, create the business plan through the use of conferences, committees, meetings, and industry experts. These ideas are then developed into a set of business concepts that the owner can use to create a viable business plan. Such a concept-based business plan is really a set of principles, themes, and models that explain how the business will solve a problem, provide a service, or make a product that is needed in the marketplace. Business concepts are only half of the challenge, however. The second portion of the road map to profitability is creating a business plan. This plan needs to include details regarding the business's structure, marketing plan, and delivery model. A successful business plan will address a small business owner's assets and abilities, competitive advantages, customer needs, intended market, and overall strategies and plans. A business plan can be completed in many ways, and will certainly be different for every business. However, the plan should not be written by the entrepreneur; it should be the end result of extensive market research, discussions with potential customers, target markets, and interviews with suppliers and distributors. When completed, a viable business plan documents the ability of a business to operate within a specific industry and solves problems with potential customers. It tells the story of the business and outlines all phases of the business operation, including the product, the delivery system, the pricing structure, and the expected profit margins. Once completed, the business owner should be able to create an up-to-date, comprehensive business plan that details

What's New in the?

By the end of the year, between two to four times more than 50 million passwords will be stolen, as criminals take advantage of vulnerabilities in enterprise software to capture credentials of employees in the course of completing applications. That's the conservative estimate from the SANS Institute. While it comes from the International Information System Security Certification Consortium (ISC)<sup>2</sup>, which outlines its methodology and process, the numbers could be many times worse. Is it the end of the world? Probably not, at least in terms of users' accounts being compromised. But the problem is that breaches of login credentials could make it extremely easy for attackers to unlock compromised accounts and gain access to secure networks or data systems. The problem with passwords is they're easy to forget and thus easy to miss. Failing to use a strong, unique password, and then not changing it when a site or application you use is compromised, are a recipe for disaster. This scheme is especially dangerous for organizations with a large number of employees who have access to multiple systems or individuals who use multiple accounts for business. But is your company prepared to handle a data breach? More importantly, what can be done to reduce risk? Phishing vs. password stealing One of the biggest problems for the security industry is making people aware of the threats posed by cyber criminals who are specifically looking for credentials like passwords. The cyber criminals are looking for people's account usernames and passwords, but are not interested in extracting data or device configuration information from their targeted users. According to the Norton 2015 Midyear Cybersecurity Report, just as many people are unaware that their password for a website could be stolen, as those who know they're at risk and have changed their passwords. "The bad guys are looking for passwords, but they aren't interested in data or configurations," says Robert G. Lee, cyber security consultant and founder of Pastoral, a Clevelandbased cyber security research and development company. This key difference in intent could be one reason why companies are open to investing in identity theft prevention systems, but aren't as concerned about password security. The issue, Lee says, is that most identity theft prevention solutions are built around password security, not around behavioral risk identification (RID), which is a concept he proposes for addressing identity theft. "Identity theft prevention is great, and yes, it reduces the risk of being the
