Tim Duncan, Boris Diaw and Tony Parker are the three biggest men on a team that is considered one of the most formidable in the NBA. But their collective size is more than just the sum of its parts, it's their combination of intelligence and athleticism, fueled by a fierce desire to win. That's why the Spurs are a hard team to prepare for and why they were the most prolific offensive rebounding team in the NBA this past season. I spoke to one of their assistant coaches who said that the key for them was to remain steady and constant in how they approach the game, to not change the strategy, but instead tweak it and adjust based on their opponents. That's a key trait of Duncan. He is more of a steady hand in the middle, but when the team needs him to switch gears and become more active, he's more than willing to do so. This past season, the Spurs kept the Heat from staying in front of them and away from their shot, and they did so with Duncan switching on defense more often than ever. That's not to say the four big men don't work together, the team was a force in transition because of it. They are all players who have made their careers in the Spurs system, where they were taught to play basketball as well as any coach in the league. "This system is special," said Diaw. "I'm a veteran in this system, it's a 5b5f913d15

This study provides information on the transport of maleic anhydride (MA) in groundwater and surface water in connection with injection for enhanced oil recovery (EOR). The transport of MA was studied in two two-dimensional flow cell experiments, two one-dimensional numerical simulations and a one-dimensional field test. The results indicated that the half-life of MA in groundwater was in the order of 1.5-6.5 days, and the rate of infiltration was significantly lower than expected on the basis of groundwater flow and it was influenced by the hydraulic conductivity of the porous media. In the two-dimensional numerical simulation, the movement of MA was described by a groundwater flow equation. The one-dimensional numerical simulation and the field test showed a clearly decreasing concentration gradient of MA along the profile and hence that the system was stable. The transport of MA in the saturated zone of the aquifer was insignificant. The mass transport of MA from the injection well to the target well through a zone of unsaturated soil occurred primarily by diffusion. This migration took place through the vadose zone and partly through water in the unsaturated zone. The migration of MA in the unsaturated zone was two orders of magnitude faster than that through the vadose zone. The results indicated that MA was transported to the target well by diffusion and convection, with the concentration gradient of MA in the unsaturated zone significantly decreasing.2009–10 FC Nantes Atlantique season The 2009-10 season was the 86th professional season of the club since its creation in 1919.
