1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to improvements in disk drive suspensions, and more particularly to improvements in the preload of a disk drive suspension having load beam and gimbal arms.

2. Description of the Prior Art Disk drive suspensions are used to support read/write heads that read data from and write data on a spinning data storage disk. To read data from or write data on the disk, the read/write head is aligned with respect to the disk and then a predetermined force is applied to the suspension to load the read/write head against the disk. Numerous configurations of suspensions and read/write heads are known in the prior art. Disk drives are subject to a variety of dynamic forces and moments during the course of normal operation. In addition to an applied load force, many suspensions of the prior art are subject to suspension bending and torsion, particularly in applications that require the use of a head having a long read/write element, i.e., a read/write head that is longer than the thickness of a data storage disk.

Several suspension designs are shown in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,967,463 and 5,014,036 (both to Eddison et al.), and U.S. Pat. No. 5,315,486 (to Montalvo et al.) and U.S. Pat. No. 4,761,627 (to Ayukawa et al.). A gimbal mounted read/write head is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,095,515 to Stange et al. A particularly useful head suspension for a
