----- The English language version of Ladybird and Raindrops is a theme that will suit the ...The BBC says it will not attempt to apologise for failing to report on a row involving Meghan Markle and her family after she made a public complaint. Ms Markle reportedly said that the TV network, which she accused of "abhorrent behaviour" during her UK tour in November, had ignored her complaints in an interview with US news channel TMZ. The BBC apologised for its coverage of the Royal tour when Ms Markle took issue with how her family were reported by the media. A BBC spokesperson told Sky News: "The BBC was not aware of the concerns that Ms Markle raised with US media about the press treatment she received during her trip to the UK. "When it became aware of the concerns, the BBC apologised and immediately acted to address the situation. "The BBC's reporting of the tour has not changed." A number of other media outlets have been criticised for their reporting of Ms Markle's comments. Vanity Fair magazine, in a tweet on Twitter, said that her criticisms of the BBC were "overblown" and "misleading". In a series of messages on social media, Ms Markle accused the BBC of "abhorrent behaviour" in their reporting of her family and claimed the network was motivated by "gossip and fame". It also sparked a row with both the Royal family and the Duchess of Sussex's husband Prince Harry, who also expressed concern about the BBC. In a statement, the BBC defended its reporting of the tour and said it did not breach a royal family agreement with the Duchess of Sussex. Read more Read More "The BBC did not breach any terms and conditions agreed by the Duke and Duchess of Sussex during the filming of the BBC documentary, An Audience with Meghan and Harry," the corporation said. The BBC said it had received "no official complaint" from the Royal couple about the way it had reported Ms Markle's interview and it is "unfair" to call the complaints "misleading" and "abusive". The BBC also defended the style of the programme, which was filmed and broadcast before it was aware of any media interest in it. The corporation said it was the "standard procedure" to obtain written permission from "any individual or individuals for the use of photographs and film footage" and that the

The Chinese defense minister is on record saying the U.S. military should be moved out of the Asia-Pacific region, but the Pentagon does not see any need for the changes. Although Defense Minister Gen. Wei Fenghe's remarks appear to reflect a Chinese strategy that calls for the country to dominate the Western Pacific, U.S. military officials say they have no plans to leave the region. "I can't think of a reason why we would be looking to withdraw from the region," Army Gen. Joseph Votel, the top U.S. military commander in the region, said during a trip to the Philippines in September. "We have a very good relationship with our allies, our partners, in the region." At the same time, Chinese President Xi Jinping's plan to increase the People's Liberation Army's overseas presence and to "strengthen the armed forces' ability to win comprehensive victories" are signs that Beijing's approach to the region is changing, Gen. Robert B. Brown, the top U.S. Marine Corps general in the region, said during a visit to Japan in September. China is "looking to show that they have options, they have capability to respond if they need to," said Brown, who is also the deputy commandant for plans, policies and operations. The Pentagon's strategy toward China is centered on projecting military power to counter the rise of the country as an international power. But with two services, a command structure and different views on strategy, U.S. policy toward China is complicated. Chinese officials have made it clear that they are reassessing the country's relations with the United States and want Washington to play a lesser role. Last month, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi's call for the United States to end its arms sales to Taiwan is one example. China and the U.S. also have a dispute over trade issues and the status of Taiwan, which China claims as its own territory. So far, the United States has maintained a defense relationship with Taiwan, a treaty ally under the U.S. Constitution.

But China says it opposes arms sales to Taiwan and sees them as a violation of the U.S.-China “one China” policy, which stipulates there is but one China and Taiwan is an independent country. Trump administration officials are aware of the importance China attaches to Taiwan. And they are concerned by China’s military build-up in the region, including in the South China
