Q: How do I prevent my players from getting bored of this adventure? I recently just finished an adventure in my Pathfinder campaign, and I want to continue the campaign with a new set of characters. That being said, how can I keep players from getting bored of the adventure or the DM style that I create? I do have some ideas, but I am looking for other things to make it even more fun and exciting for them. A: Allow them to play what they want! Some people want to roleplay a bard. Some people want to play a cleric. Some people are also excellent at strategy. (And some of them can play 1, 2, or even 3 at a time.) When you roleplay, let them be themselves. Don't force it on them. Don't try to make them into something that they're not. Let their character drive the story. It's hard to make a character who is determined to do the right thing and fails, or one who has the good intentions and succeeds, if you force the story to you. I'd also suggest a little perspective. I've only done games with my friends (and sometimes with others), and I've played Pathfinder specifically because I have a group of friends. I've never played at conventions, I've never been a GM at a D&D or Pathfinder table.

As it turns out, this is a different way of playing. It's a different style. But I enjoy it, and so do my players. If they don't, that's on them. Your players should be able to do all of this, and more! Just because you feel like those other options would be more fun, doesn't mean they are, and vice versa. A: I've had the luck of playing a 4th edition D&D game with a number of players who are adventure-cravers at heart. This can be kind of weird if you're used to telling story in a more cinematic fashion. They'll tell you about their idea for a cool location or encounter, and you'll almost invariably see it come to life in game. And if not, you'll almost invariably hear "but I wanted to do X." The best way I've been able to deal with this is to just allow it. They're shooting for cool, they're shooting for fun. If you're a good and welcoming GM, the players should want to Increased heart rate variability during sleep is related to tumor load in melanoma patients. Sleep is known to have a restorative function by which the body recovers from daily life activities. In the present study, in the presence of melanoma, we investigated heart rate variability in patients during sleep. For 28 days (n = 57), 24-h electrocardiographic recordings and hormonal measurements were performed in 42 melanoma patients and 16 healthy subjects. For the latter group, the parameters that were assessed were: heart rate variability during sleep (as indicated by the coefficient of variation of the R-R intervals), diurnal variations, and the chronotype. Additionally, we obtained absolute melatonin values. The patients showed a higher rate of variability during sleep (12.6 +/- 5.1%) compared to controls (4.8 +/- 1.5%), mainly in patients with nodular melanoma ($P = 0.007$). There was a relationship between increased measures of heart rate variability during sleep and the number of metastatic lymph nodes ($P = 0.05$). The chronotype scores were negatively correlated with the number of melanoma cells ($P = 0.05$). In conclusion, an abnormal increase in heart rate variability in the presence of melanoma might be a marker of tumor load. An aberrant circadian rhythm of melatonin might play an important role in the pathogenesis of this disorder.Tana: Attached is another request for a market data request to be done with us.
