Reason being if the user is offline the preferences items will be loaded from the server and hence we can set the items to be loaded only when the user is logged on. When I looked for the solution I found a lot of people were using SharedPreferences with a key to store only an item of interest and this was added to the preference screen and the other items were loaded from the server (only when the user is logged on). Now, I am looking at them and see multiple items with similar entries. The one that piqued my interest was How does a key entry that can only be one value per preference different from having multiple keys to a single setting that can contain multiple values? A: I got into a very nice blog post which explains how SharedPreferences works in depth. Basically your question is pretty much answered when you read the blog. How does a key entry that can only be one value per preference different from having multiple keys to a single setting that can contain multiple values? You don't have to use SharedPreferences for the second case. In the first case you have different keys with the same/only one value for each one. This is why you should avoid this approach and use SharedPreferences when possible. What I find very interesting is that the Android SDK uses SharedPreferences but doesn't implement everything that is required. You can also use a Map object (note: This only works when the entries are strings) You can use a StringBuilder to avoid the problem that the values can become big (see the blog post I link to in my answer for an explanation why this can be a problem)

Aprotinin, a serine protease inhibitor, has several potentially beneficial effects in cardiac surgery. This study tested the hypothesis that high-dose aprotinin given before, during, and after cardiopulmonary bypass would decrease inotropic support requirements and enhance early and late postoperative recovery in patients undergoing coronary artery bypass grafting. One hundred patients undergoing coronary artery bypass grafting were randomized into four groups. The first group was a control group in which high-dose aprotinin (32,000 KIU/kg) was not given (n = 25). The second group received high-dose aprotinin (32,000 KIU/kg) before, during, and after cardiopulmonary bypass (n = 25). The third group received the same dose of aprotinin before cardiopulmonary bypass and normal saline after bypass (n = 25). The fourth group received normal saline before, during, and after cardiopulmonary bypass (n = 25). Patients were observed for postoperative mediastinal, pulmonary, and renal complications. Systolic and diastolic blood pressures, central venous pressure, pulmonary capillary wedge pressure, left ventricular stroke work index, and all measured variables except left ventricular stroke work index and cardiac index were not significantly different between the four groups. Postoperative mediastinal pain score and pulmonary and renal complications were similar in the four groups. Central venous pressure increased at the end of cardiopulmonary bypass in the control group, and high-dose aprotinin groups decreased the increase. High-dose aprotinin given before, during, and after cardiopulmonary bypass does not benefit patients undergoing coronary artery bypass grafting. Although high-dose aprotinin reduces increases in central venous pressure, its effect is small and does not enhance early or late postoperative recovery.London: Some senior Pakistani politicians have expressed support for India's move to isolate Pakistan's 'all-weather ally', China, by creating 1cb139a0ed
