The Efficacy of Interventions to Improve Parent-Child Communication for Children with Autism Spectrum Disorder and Developmental Delay. Communication is a foundational aspect of all human-human relationships, and it is a vital factor in children's emotional and social development. Children with Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD) and Developmental Delay (DD) often have difficulty communicating with their families and caregivers and may do so via challenging behaviors. The purposes of this review are to identify the effectiveness of parenting interventions for improving parent-child communication and the use of communication skills by children with ASD and DD. This review included randomized and non-randomized controlled trials. We reviewed 12 studies of interventions that specifically targeted the improvement of parent-child communication for children with ASD and DD. Overall, the findings suggest that parent-child communication interventions are beneficial for children with ASD and DD. However, the majority of the studies reviewed were parent-only interventions. Although the interventions were somewhat effective, they did not provide sufficient information about how the intervention was implemented, nor were they longer-term studies. Further research with longer follow-up periods, a more thorough theoretical underpinning, and detailed descriptions of the intervention in general and for specific aspects of the intervention is warranted. A NEW study by one of our students (Simon Zhang) and his advisor (Professor Nicos Periklis) has been published this month in PLoS-One as an article entitled: "A novel RNA-DNA hybridization platform developed for the Microplate Microarray Nanofluidic Mass Spectrometry assay." It is about the development of a new assay and device for detection and characterization of DNA and RNA in a microfluidic assay 1cb139a0ed
