Self-selection in mental health seeking in a low-income metropolitan population. This study determined the characteristics associated with people's choice of health services in a public mental health system in which Medicaid reimbursement rates were lower for counseling services than for hospitalization. Using a multivariate analysis, data were collected from 92 interviewees, representative of the 1,737 persons seen in a public agency's outpatient clinic during a 5-month period. Results suggest that (1) persons with greater psychiatric symptoms and poorer self-assessed physical health were more likely to seek counseling services, (2) females were more likely than males to seek counseling, and (3) people with higher income and more education were more likely than those with lower income and less education to obtain counseling services.
