Complete with realistic evergreens scattered with snow, it brings to life a majestic and tranquil scenery. All in all a fast and easy to use screensaver. Although it uses your system resources it's not too demanding on your system. I would say to have it downloaded and set as a screensaver because it is really that good. I had a little bit of issues installing it, but once it was installed I was very happy with the results. I like that it actually uses your computer when it is idle and not just a screensaver that you can't get back to. It is so beautiful and a nice change to the standard boring ones. The music is not to bad and definitely not to loud. One small suggestion is that you could make it so that when you bring your computer back into the 'active' state that it is already running the screen saver. That way, there would be no need to have the screen saver set to 'activate on idle' because you can just put your computer to sleep. I am using Windows XP and I downloaded this screen saver from here: On the website there is information to 'activate on idle', but this only works with the version that I downloaded. I found that the instructions there were not exactly clear. The version that I downloaded does not have this option. Is there a way to change the snow flurries to be more like the ones in the video? I did see that there was a version with a faster snow dance but I could not find it. Actually
