Following the dyeing process, the textile and apparel are typically washed and either heat set or treated by other finishing techniques which permanently shape and set the fabric. One disadvantage associated with the use of several of the heretofore known finishing techniques is that the textile and/or apparel must be removed from the finishing machine while being wet and either left in the wet condition or hung up to dry in order to be later collected and packaged for shipment. As is also well known, the wetting and drying of textile and/or apparel presents a significant health and safety problem. With many of the wet finishing techniques, there is an inherent and unacceptable risk to the workers engaged in such operations. Another disadvantage associated with the use of several of the heretofore known wet finishing techniques is that the drying of the textile and/or apparel is time consuming and inefficient and, in some instances, dangerous. Moreover, many of the heretofore known wet finishing techniques are not compatible for the finishing of certain types of textile and apparel which require quick dry in order to preserve the integrity of the textile and/or apparel. Accordingly, it is an object of this invention to provide a wet finishing machine which does not present the previously noted disadvantages. It is another object of this invention to provide a wet finishing machine which can be used to finish textile and/or apparel in a quick dry condition which insures the integrity of the wet finished article.The assessment of the community behavioural impact of the condom: the Hyderabad study. This paper presents a conceptual framework and a systematic process for evaluating the effectiveness of interventions designed to improve the health, safety, and well-being of homebound older adults. We identified and selected evaluative approaches in the literature and the Methods in Health Care Evaluation Resource Book (MHer/EvalBook, Version 2.0) to provide guidance in using these approaches. Theoretical frameworks and methodological concepts were applied to case study data to identify and document gaps in knowledge about the effectiveness of interventions designed to improve patient outcomes of homebound older adults. We describe the study framework and method and present the outcomes of that method. The evaluation framework synthesized research from multiple disciplines and used multiple methodological approaches, including multiple methods for data collection, analysis, and interpretation. With regard to the outcome of the study, key results included: (a) cost-effectiveness was not demonstrated, although some results suggest lower-cost alternatives that were not examined; (b) the evaluation did not address whether interventions enhanced well-being and health outcomes; (c) interventions were generally considered successful, but no pattern was discerned in the outcomes examined; (d) the quality of research in this field is weak, because few studies reported on methodological issues and most lacked randomization, comparisons between groups, and long-term follow-up; and (e) interventions may need to be modified if they are to be most effective. This systematic evaluation of the research literature provided a foundation for developing guidance on the evaluation of interventions designed to improve patient outcomes for homebound older adults.using
