Category:Software using the LGPL licensePhoto by A. Mazzetti on Unsplash It's only been a couple of days, but I already feel that 2016 has been a bit more chaotic than 2015. That's right, we managed to make one less post than last year, and it's hard to go more than two weeks without a post, so we are safe. The year started off with a bang. I just finished reading the Scientific American book on the evolution of religion, and a few of my friends were already talking about the atheism gene. This got me thinking. Is there a lot of choice in whether or not you are an atheist? Or are we born that way? I went down to my local library, where they had a copy of Scott Atran's book Talking to God. I was intrigued by the title, and had heard of the author because he was the guy that coined the term "epigenetics". It basically says that your genetic makeup is not determined by your parents, but your environment. There are several factors at play, but epigenetics tends to play a big role. This lead me to think about how certain things were set in stone when I was born, but as an adult, I was able to make other choices. So, I set out to find a study that would go in to this. After a bit of searching, I came across a study done by Eric 5b5f913d15

Q: Save a request body as a file in PHP If I am sending a multipart/form-data request using PHP cURL, is there a way to get the content of a particular input value (e.g. a file) and save it to a file? I don't want to store it in the database, I want to have it in file on the server. A: Use the CURLFile class to get the content of a file and save it. Then use file_put_contents() to save the file.

You can store the file anywhere in your system. This is taken from their manual: Behavioral deficits in a mouse model of Fragile X Syndrome: can we reduce the effect of the mutation? Fragile X Syndrome (FXS) is the most common cause of autism and is the only one for which a protein encoded by a gene can be linked to the pathophysiology of the disease. Recent studies show that FXS symptoms can be mediated by the maternal transmission of an allele with a mutation in the fragile X mental retardation 1 (Fmr1) gene, a gene that encodes the RNA binding protein FMRP. There is evidence that FMRP plays a role in several behavioral domains including anxiety-like behavior. This study examines whether the administration of the NMDA receptor antagonist MK-801 to mice carrying the mutation reduces the differences in anxiety between the Fmr1(CGG) male and wild type (WT) female mice. Surprisingly, although MK-801 significantly reduced the duration of immobility in the plus maze, a test measuring anxiety-like behavior in the Fmr1(CGG) mice, there was no significant difference between WT and Fmr1(CGG) female mice in the duration of immobility. However, when both male and female mice were analyzed together there was a significant difference in the duration of immobility. Furthermore, there was a significant difference in the duration of the active avoidance learning
