TRANSPORTATION - a mode of transport that includes the movement of goods, passengers in physical space (or spaces) or, similarly to transport, the movement of products, objects of labor or information in space (in the brain) and space (between the brain and other objects). The term "transport" was originally defined through the term "movement": its derivatives are the movement (distribution) of a message, the movement of information, the movement of people and goods, etc. "Transport" is common in modern social science mainly in conjunction with such concepts as the movement of the body, movement of vehicles, movement of a signal, movement of mass, movement of radio waves, etc. Transport systems in the broadest sense of the concept include all types of transport, i.e. transport systems in the narrow sense of the word - all types of messages. Currently, transport is understood mainly as the ability of an organism to move a body in space at a given speed. A more recent formulation allows one to consider transport as a means of moving people, goods and energy. In this case, "transport systems" are defined as "ways (movements) and means (vehicles) of movement designed in transport systems" (Cheshalov L. V., Soyfer N. I., 1958). There are several different definitions of the term "transport", based on different principles of its definition, which reflect the degree of generalization of the concept. Below we consider the concept of "transport system", reflected in the works of modern authors that meet the criteria of a generally accepted view in science. The most important criterion is the assignment to the system of vehicles and goods, which is associated with the peculiarities of scientific thought. Currently, two main criteria have been adopted that determine the transport system: The transport system is a set of processes and devices designed to transport people and goods. The organizational structure of the organization, providing the optimal combination of production, transportation and warehousing processes while ensuring optimal working and rest conditions for all its members. Principles of organization of the transport support system. Study of the qualities, properties, forms and structures of transport and technical systems at the enterprise, analysis of their state and development opportunities. The main feature is the use of human means and the organization of movement to overcome the natural and social factors characteristic of the labor process. (The concept outlined in the works of N. A. Dolgov (NSTU) 1996, 1995). Wikipedia has articles about other people named Anselm and last name Rutherford.
