The purpose of this in vitro study was to investigate the influence of bar morphology on the removability and effect of bracket adhesives (self-etching systems and conventional phosphoric acid etching). A total of 40 fully edentulous human maxillary premolars were divided into four groups of ten samples each. These included no cobalt-chromium (Co-Cr) alloy bar, a straight bar, a helical bar and a spiral bar. In each group, tooth samples were bonded using a total of four bracket bonding systems (in two different modes of application). The bonding modes were either standard application of test adhesives or spraying of test adhesives. Bracket removal was attempted after 3 days (removal force value of 100 N). The bracket adhesive film was then removed using a scaler. The removal force was measured with a load cell. Data were subjected to one-way analysis of variance and the Tukey test was used for statistical analysis. The force required to remove the bracket was significantly lower for the two self-etching adhesives applied in the standard application mode than for the other test adhesives. Statistically significant differences in the removal force were observed for each group of bracket bonded using the different test adhesives. The relative surface area of the exposed enamel significantly influenced the removal force. The Co-Cr alloy bar bars reduced the removal force significantly in comparison with the no bar control groups. There was no significant difference in the removal force between the Co-Cr alloy bars with different shapes.Q: How does C# decide where to deserialize? I have some
