Its purpose is to provide a faster and more uniform drying, with less energy use, than simply using ambient air. This can be accomplished by using high-intensity lamps and/or by placing an electric current through the material being dried. Typical uses are in the food, medicine, and ceramic industries. History Conductive drying was invented in 1936 by Chester A. Linden of the University of Wisconsin and the American Society for Microbiology, who recognized that electricity is a more effective alternative to convection currents in drying processes. At that time, the most widespread method of drying was to use hot air. In the past, devices were designed to mimic the wetting of fruits and vegetables, called peels, during the drying process. In 1938, two physicists, R. H. Beil and F. C. B. Ogilby, working at the General Electric Research Laboratories, used a graphite strip between two cylinders, which produced a strong electric current in the conductive water, which would then carry the heat of the drying current away from the food. In the 1960s, the first widely available commercial devices were the Slik-Dryer 1d6a3396d6

Shenzhen Dandy (China) Shenzhen is the largest city in the region of Guangdong, and is one of the most modern cities in China, however it is a very interesting city to visit especially for the "Dandy" population. In the city we found a fair number of buildings with big windows (either front or back facing), and it seemed like every second building had a round or rectangular window. The inside of the windows were then decorated with paintings, murals, art, coloured glass or anything else you can imagine. People would walk by and stare at the paintings, it was quite funny to see. There were many small streets that were kind of like alleyways between the buildings. These were narrow with shops on both sides, and sometimes, when you walked through there, people would stop and stare and take pictures of you. Most of the shops were selling clothing, shoes, souvenirs and what-have-you. We saw a lot of unique sights here in Shenzhen, some of them are listed below: In Houhai, in the water park, you can see the Mermaid Fountain, which has lots of fountains shooting water into the air and then the water falls down into a
