Set Up At the time of creating a new document, whether it be a layered print or a file for print, the program prompts you for a filename extension. For some strange reason this can be a tricky question for many people, but it really shouldn't be hard to understand. Once you hit the OK button, Photoshop asks you to give the new image a name. The default is "Untitled" (the first untitled document), or you can try "Untitled" and then rename it once you are happy with the name. The next step is to choose a file type for the image. Once you select the type, you can choose from a variety of options such as whether the image is monochrome, color, or grayscale. This is used to display the image in different ways and also to alter the image settings. If you are starting with a monochrome image that you will be developing as a black-and-white image, choose Black and White. Alternatively, if you want to make sure that you have a 100 percent black-and-white image, choose Grayscale. If you don't want to get too worried about a color image, select Grayscale. The next step is to decide how you are going to organize the image. You can do this in several different ways, and you will see the options in the Layers panel. There are four basic options. They are outlined in the following list: 1. Save for Web —Use this option for simple black-and-white web graphics. 2. Save for Web + Keep Layers —This option keeps the current image and all of the layers as they are, but adds them to the Photoshop file as a web graphic. 3. Save
