Endogenous control of matrix metalloproteinase (MMP) activity is provided in part by alpha 2-macroglobulin (alpha 2M), a major inhibitor of these enzymes. The structural domains of alpha 2M mediating its interaction with MMPs have been studied in the present investigation.

Rabbit anti-human alpha 2M (R-H alpha 2M) and monoclonal antibodies (m-Abs) specific for different domains of alpha 2M were used as tools to study the interaction of alpha 2M with individual members of the MMP family. R-H alpha 2M specifically inhibited the catalytic activity of several MMPs. This inhibition was shown to be dependent on the total size of the molecule of R-H alpha 2M. In contrast, m-Abs directed against different domains of alpha 2M specifically inhibited the catalytic activity of the corresponding MMPs. A peptide corresponding to the main proteolytic domain of alpha 2M efficiently inhibited the catalytic activity of MMP-1; in contrast, the inhibitory activity of the peptide was less effective against MMP-2. Peptides corresponding to the C-terminal half of the molecule of alpha 2M, which contain the Zn(II) binding sites, were ineffective in inhibiting MMP-2 activity. Our results indicate that the structural domains of alpha 2M involved in its interactions with MMPs are distinct. One of these domains (main proteolytic domain) is associated with proteolysis, whereas the other one (Zn(II)-binding sites) may play a role in MMP inhibition.
