The present invention relates generally to audio speakers, and more particularly to a video game sound system for directing audio and visual signals from a computer game. Speakers are often used to generate sound for audio-visual (AV) games and for music. In many AV games, a volume adjustment is made by turning the volume control knob on the audio unit to a position corresponding to the desired audio level. In general, the sound-generating speaker provides a uniform output level throughout a three-dimensional area that is determined by the diameter of the speaker cone. Because the cone diameter is fixed, the output level cannot be changed without also changing the output level of the speaker. Music games, such as the music game sold under the trademarks PONGmusic and PONG music, have a speaker that produces different musical notes or chords in response to the movement of a joy stick. Typically, the music is recorded on magnetic tape. As the player moves the joy stick, the tape player is adjusted to produce different note or chord sounds. At present, the player is not able to direct the audio output of the joy stick to a particular area. The output of the joy stick must be directed to the entire three-dimensional space surrounding the player. A need has thus arisen for a speaker system in an AV game that enables the sound and/or visual output to be directed to a particular area within a three-dimensional region.
