Three groups, including two from City of London, are holding talks to find an 'alternative' to the controversial Bank of England's proposed "sovereign," digital currency. London-based bitcoin start-up Circle has emerged as one of the most active participants in the process, attempting to reinvigorate the more moderate stance of the 'Libor Affair' – which saw U.K. bankster resign for their involvement in the manipulation of Libor, the U.K. interbank lending rate. In a first for the City, Circle's now-deleted website stated that it would be collaborating with the Institute for New Economic Thinking (INET), which is led by Nobel Prize-winner Joseph Stiglitz, and the Open Money Institute (OMI), a non-profit founded in 2012 to offer alternatives to central banks. However, in a statement today, Circle said that its priorities were different to those

The critical roles that bone marrow (BM)-derived stromal cells play in the biology of solid tumours have been suggested. To investigate whether BM-derived stromal cells are involved in the infiltration of solid tumours, we studied the density of BM-derived cells in primary human breast tumours (n = 200). Our results demonstrated that the microvessel density and the density of BM-derived stromal cells in breast carcinomas were negatively correlated (r = -0.305, P
