Portable Ohanae is a unique, portable multi-factor authentication (MFA) solution that protects users from both phishing and key logging attacks. It uses a groundbreaking methodology to ensure that your login credentials cannot be guessed, phished, or stolen. You only need to remember one passphrase, type at the password field, and type to log in to any sites, or popular client-side applications. Friday, May 5, 2013 PC headsets continue to raise consumer concerns due to their size, and cost. In this new model, the exterior and interior are constructed from a single piece of acrylonitrile butadiene styrene (ABS). The headset is a simple one piece design that has a microphone and speaker near your ears and a connection pad where you can plug in a proprietary battery powered radio. An open source device driver is available to add the optional microphone for use on many operating systems. A review of the design process at Inspur was included in the article below: Considering the size of the new headset, Inspur has made some interesting changes to the design to make them easier and more comfortable to wear and use. First up, the headset uses a single piece of acrylonitrile butadiene styrene (ABS) to cover everything but the microphone, which is now a separate piece, but is very small and sits near the ear. At the back of the headset, there is a simple plug connection for a proprietary radio. In the center of the headset, a protrusion juts out from the front and towards the head, slightly tilted to help keep the microphone in the best position for voice communication. The sides are rounded to avoid scraping the ear with any sharp edges. The back of the headset contains the volume control and the port for the microphone. Because the speaker is integrated into the headset itself, there is no external speaker and no slot in the back of the head to support it. Keyboards and mice are nothing new, they have been used for a long time. In this post I will take a look at the state of wearables and what their relative potential is for replacing peripherals. A Piezo based mechanical keyboard The most well-known mechanical keyboard in the world is the Cherry G80 keyboard. By the time the Cherry G80 was released in 2005, it had become one of the most well-known peripherals on the market. By the time the Cherry G 6a5afdab4c
