Rating:Q: xterm in terminal doesn't seem to work as I expect I have a strange issue with the terminal in CentOS 7. The terminal I use is xterm, and whenever I use anything not in my home directory (including sudo) I get a seemingly randomly generated (without any sort of pattern) string of numbers. I'm guessing it's some sort of permissions issue, but I have no idea how to fix it. I did see this post, but I'm not sure what is happening with the code given in the answers there. A: I ended up resolving the issue by using a bash shell with a different background color. It was weird, but it worked. I'm still interested in any further explanation of this issue though. in particular, and is also more prone to errors in comparison to relative measurements and absolute measurements. Errors of temperature measurement using absolute measurements are caused by error in positioning of the temperature measurement probe. This error can be due to movement of the probe in the conductive fluid and/or inhomogeneities in the conductive fluid. The positioning errors are the main source of the temperature measurement errors with the absolute measurements. In contrast to the absolute measurements, errors in relative measurements are caused by the fact that the temperature of the conductive fluid is not measured directly but in terms of temperature difference in the probe with respect to the bath temperature. Errors due to positioning errors are also present in this case, but in addition to this the temperature of the probe must be very accurately known, and the temperature of the conductive fluid at the point of temperature measurement must also be known with high accuracy. In addition to the absolute and the relative measurements, there are also “absolute-relative” measurements where the temperature measurement probe is positioned with respect to the position of the sample. The temperature measurements with absolute, relative and absolute-relative measurements are each performed in different ways. The positioning of the temperature probe is different in each case. The main advantage of absolute temperature measurements is that they are independent of the position of the temperature probe. This has the advantage that it is possible to use the absolute temperature measurements to calculate the temperature of the sample and the temperature of the temperature probe in a simple manner. However
