When governments step up to the plate and provide health care for all their citizens, it becomes pretty clear that the people who need it the most will be left out in the cold. That's not to say that health care should be withheld or that people won't do everything they can to get it; of course they will. But there will inevitably be some who are prevented from receiving vital care, so it's best to think of the people who are left out in the cold as those who are on the wrong end of the coverage gap. Now that we're in the thick of the healthcare debate, I'd like to propose a simple solution: reestablish a government-sponsored program to offer free health care to people who are in dire need. Our health care system right now is divided into two countries. The United States has 50 state-based insurance programs that work well for the vast majority of the population who have coverage that allows them to receive free health care (i.e. Medicare and Medicaid, CHIP, and others). But there is a gigantic swath of the population who are uninsured or underinsured, and the lack of coverage is often compounded when people can't afford the out of pocket costs of care. A lot of folks who have jobs but can't afford insurance or can't find affordable coverage are on the wrong end of the coverage gap, and they're going without care. But there is another group of people who also need access to affordable coverage: people who were unable to obtain coverage through their own efforts (e.g. they lost their job or their coverage, or were born with a chronic illness). These are the people who would benefit from a program that provides insurance, but simply can't afford it. So they're forced into the dark forest, where health care is available, but only if you're willing to pay out of pocket. This is
