KeyMACRO is a handy application that allows users to conveniently manage their private, protected keys, by inputting them with ease and having an easy time. A dedicated UI is provided, as well as a unique feature that allows users to automatically test the strength of their passwords, right from within the program itself. KeyMACRO's developers have carefully worked on the app, making it as effective as possible. The program includes numerous ways of using its functions and the best thing about the app is that it does all the hard work for you. Whenever you need to use a protected key, simply click on the appropriate button and the app will take care of the rest. The biggest feature the app offers is its ability to automatically test the strength of the entered password and its corresponding key. Users can choose to have a different indicator displayed for each of their keys, but this requires the user to be aware of the functions of each key. One of the biggest drawbacks to the app is the fact that there's currently no way of easily backing-up one's protected keys, although this is something the developers are aware of. Latest version: 0.9.2.1

What's New In?

Periodically, I get the urge to stop "overlooking" certain websites, simply due to my inability to remember passwords. For the most part, it seems to be the case that the current online environment and users make the most common credentials too simplistic or re-use them on several websites. Therefore, it's not uncommon for people to end up with a password that may be easily guessed, and due to being so – a piece of mind and also a convenience– often end up reusing it. At the same time, some websites seem to be harder to remember than others, while others use entirely different means to access, for instance, their databases. All this, essentially makes for a lot of wasted time on figuring out credentials for the vast majority of websites. The good news is, with a little bit of time and effort, you can easily have these saved in a way that makes it easier for you to access them later. In other words, using online password managers is the only way to go. So, if you're looking for a good password manager, FW Password Manager may be your best bet. Description: The best password managers... well, they do most of the work for you. They'll periodically check if you've forgotten your credentials for some websites, and even create (and test) new ones for you. Usually, you'll be able to specify the site, the length and even certain keywords. Some of these managers have even begun adding features like extra advice on how to improve your credentials. Description: One of the most popular apps of this type is Dashlane, which happens to be free for the moment, but you will have to pay for its premium counterpart to access all its features. With this app, you're allowed to generate new passwords for any website, from any device. As mentioned, the initial free version of the app has limitations when it comes to sites. However, if you're using it to test your existing passwords and to possibly edit and/or shorten them, then the paid version could be a wise choice. It'll allow you to add new passwords, create new entries, as well as test them. And, as is the case with many other apps like this, the ability to add a password is not dependent on the sites that you use, and it's also not locked to any particular browser. You can use it on any device you like, so that all your passwords are always accessible. This app does allow you to lock the app, in case you forget your passwords, but that's the only requirement that the app asks of you.
