Large scale, long-term automated testing procedures for the use of modern equipment for biological warfare detection and decontamination processes are needed because of the increased quantity of these material during recent times. Since the discovery of the biological warfare agent anthrax in the United States in the 1970s, the motivation for the development of automatic testing methods has increased. (See Table 3). The capability of the U.S. military to respond to biological attacks on their troops and civilians is impaired by equipment and procedures for field tests for anthrax spores that are too small to rapidly process samples of the large quantities needed for use in mock attacks. (See U.S. Army Biol. Medical and Chemical Corps, E2-H II Field Manual, October, 1986, Chapter 5). More importantly, the facilities in possession of the United States' military are not sufficiently large to conduct the number of tests needed to determine which troops are exposed and to decontaminate the
