What's New in the?

With many new solar power contracts on the horizon, and a year of naysayers in the pipeline, many people have trouble understanding what is going on in the industry. That is understandable, because solar power is a complex business that involves a lot of moving parts. The CleanTechnica reader feedback that we have seen in the form of email, commenting on articles and posted on our Facebook page, has been consistent and clear: you want to know what the money is being spent on. The following is a listing of some of the more significant and surprising costs associated with the installation and operation of solar panels. (According to the CleanTechnica 2016 Solar Market Report, the average price of a residential solar installation in the US was $13,700. The average monthly electricity bill in the US: $144.) Installation - The up-front cost of installation, which may include mirrors, panels, labor and other materials, can vary dramatically depending on where you live, the cost of panels and other equipment and the availability of local labor. By some estimates, the installation cost in California is $50,000, but that could be closer to $100,000 if you live in, say, Michigan, Florida, or Alabama. By comparison, the initial cost of a conventional power plant, on the order of $2 million, could be paid back in 10-15 years, depending on your energy use and the energy rates in the area, not to mention tax breaks, subsidies and other incentives. Note: that does not include interest on the loan. O&M Costs - This is where the real money is going. Part of this is labor. The Los Angeles Department of Water and Power (LADWP), for example, estimates that it will cost the utility $2.5 million to operate a rooftop solar system in California for 15 years. Some areas of the country provide more local government support, but in general, it's not unusual for costs of operation and maintenance (O&M) to consume 70-90% of the cost of a project. That amount can be even higher than that if your solar project is exceeding the capacity of the battery bank, or if the system needs maintenance or upgrades. By some estimates, the O&M cost of a residential rooftop solar system is about $350 per month in California. There is also equipment cost, which is high in some states due to the prevalence of intermittent solar energy, and due to the need to hedge against
