Of course, I don't hold that prerogative against my fellow Manxmen now, but given that I don't drink or do drugs and have a desk job I don't need to be a drug addict or an alcoholic. But I'd really like to be in a position to argue that the Manx people have no right to feel bitter against the English. To be honest, the way in which the Isle of Man's relationship with England has been harmed by the English has been wildly unfair on the Manx themselves, and caused the Manx to be at odds with their European counterparts in ways they can ill afford. Britain didn't go to war on the Isle of Man when she was a republic, and didn't annex the Isle of Man before she was a monarchy. The Isle of Man has a self-governing elected House of Keys for representation, and wasn't treated as a ward of England until 1965. If there's an Englishman and a Manxman next to each other, they are likely to end up talking about something interesting, like football, rather than having to make small talk about the Isles. The English don't feel the need to apologise for their past dealings with Manx people, and the Manx are never required to apologise for the way their country has been mistreated. We can enjoy the same historical scholarship as the English, but we've never been mollycoddled

A number of bacteria can induce vertigo. Bacteria-Induced Symptoms of Vertigo. Most bacteria contain large amounts of endotoxin, a soluble constituent of the cell wall that is capable of inducing a variety of biological responses in the host. Endotoxin may cause the symptoms of the postmyocardial infarction (MSIMI) syndrome that mimics the symptoms of common meningitis. The blood-brain barrier is permeable to endotoxin and the central nervous system (CNS) responds with increased capillary permeability, edema, and fever. Bacteria-induced vertigo is reported when patients with infections (such as Lyme disease) have associated neurological symptoms, but are otherwise neurolog
