It is based on the work of Neil Pasricha, a lecturer in cognitive development at the University of Texas at Austin. Gameplay The player controls the position of a cube in a two-dimensional grid environment. When the cube passes over a goal, it disappears from the game, thus representing a lacuna, an unknown empty space. To fill a lacuna and make a goal visible again, the player must place a block in the location of the lacuna. Blocks are available in the game in one of several colors, each of which serves a different purpose. Colored blocks that cannot reach the two diagonal corners of the grid leave the game area to the player's side. A computer opponent sends cubes to fill a lacuna as well. That player's objective is to prevent the player from filling the lacunae and make the goal invisible again. Reception Lacuna received positive reviews. GameSpot praised the game for its "great
